The President and Vice President Reflect on Their Time in Office

Interview with [REDACTED] (President)

How would characterise your time in office?

If I was to characterise my time, it's very good, very good to hear people's voices and watch the school change in front of my eyes.

How do you think people will look back on your time as President?

I think they will look back on it in a good way. What I've done as head of student council is good and people will struggle to do what I've done.

What is something new you brought to the position?

That's a good question... I was one of the first, so a lot of what I did was my style. I ran the student council meetings uniquely because I did it first. I also organised meetings with Karen, the headteacher.

Will you run again in the summer term? If so, how will you excite voters?

After looking back on this term, it's been a good term. I would like to not run. I want to see other people run and enjoy the position as head of student council.

Interview with [REDACTED] (Vice-President)

How have you made the Vice-President position your own?

Well you know, I'm very helpful. I have good suggestions to fix the situation. I've fought for the people.

What was your greatest accomplishment as Vice-President?

Inspirational dress up day. We brought the school together.

How did you work with the President?

We both took our own paths and collided them together and then we managed to help the school. I supported the girls and he supported the boys.

Will you run for President next term? If so, what will your platform be?

Maybe. There's hope.

Elections for the new President and Vice President of student council will happen in January 2026.

The first ever Geography field trip at Edith Kay school was a very dampy occasion but despite storm Claudia, heavy rain and yellow weather warnings, team geography - [REDACTED], [REDACTED], Dafydd and Daniel, had a great time visiting Stratford.

The mission of our trip was to complete a field study in urban regeneration in Stratford, for this expedition, we were armed with raincoats, clipboards, pens, pencils and soggy sandwiches.

Stratford is a fascinating place for any geographer because it has a rich and varied history. We learnt that in the open this area in East London was once owned by a monastery and land was used for farming and making flour in mills. During the industrial revolution, Stratford then became a place to produce iron, hence 'The Hammers' being the symbol for West Ham football club who now play their home matches in the Olympic stadium. When London hosted the Olympics in 2012, Stratford was chosen as the site where the Olympic stadium would be built and the place where all the Olympic athletes would stay.

So what were we doing walking around with clipboards in the rain, other than looking like a super cool/nerdy boy band?

We looked at how the investment in Stratford for the 2012 Olympic games had impacted different areas, firstly looking at Newtown (which is actually the old town) and we compared how the land is used compared with the Olympic village. We were amazed to see how the old town had barely benefited from the regeneration, the housing looked run down, there was lots of rubbish on the streets and few public spaces for people to enjoy. In comparison, the investment in the Olympic village had made it a very attractive place to live, and this in turn changed people's attitudes to the place and this had positive impacts on the natural landscape as well as the social benefits of crime reduction.

This made me think about our own school, how could we make people think more positively about our area? Would litter picking outside the school make people have more respect for this street, and stop them from fly-tipping outside the school gates?

No geography field trip would be complete without a field sketch, and I am pleased to share a photo of three of us sketching the West Ham football stadium and the regeneration around Westfield shopping centre. I know I know, you are jealous but that's okay, we can go on another field trip soon, clipboards and all!

Video Game Recommendation of the month

I think we know what game is gonna come up: I'm redownloading UFC 4 tonight. It's UFC 4, the best 2 player game you can have because the rounds are short. There's no other vote. This is the only option.

Metal Gear is a peculiar game, to say the least. But it is also one of the most emotional and powerful games of all time. A game that tells a story about the horrors of war, the hardships and interests of relationships, and the nature of what defines us as people.

Sports:
Speech on Raheem Sterling
by [REDACTED]

I'm here to talk about Raheem Sterling, an English professional footballer who climbed up the ranks taking the Premier League by storm.

Every young boy's dream is to become a professional footballer. It's hard dedicated work and highly unlikely, especially trying to get into an academy at a young age.

Sterling and his family came to England from Jamaica when he was five. He never knew his dad; he was murdered out there when Raheem was two.

As we know him now as one of Manchester City's best players, people think he had it easy. As a child Sterling attended Vernon House, a special school in Neasden because he had anger issues. He did well at Vernon House and went back to mainstream school.

Sterling joined Queens Park Rangers which was a massive turning point in the early career of a young superstar. He was scouted by many other big clubs, but his mother encouraged him to choose a club outside of London. Raheem was 15 when signing for Liverpool's youth team and made his debut for the first team aged 17.

The young English winger joined Manchester City at the end of the 2014-15 season for a fee of £49 million, becoming the most expensive English footballer at the time.

Sterling is an inspirational person to look up to. As well as his achievements at Man City he has become a leader and courageous voice in the fight against racism in football and society. He has won multiple Premier League titles and hopes to regain his form.
